List of Army Correspondence Courses Worth Promotion Points List of army correspondence courses worth promotion points is a topic that many soldiers find crucial when planning their professional development. In the Army, advancing in rank isn't just about time served or physical fitness; education and self-improvement play significant roles. Correspondence courses offer a flexible way for soldiers to enhance their knowledge, skills, and competitiveness for promotion boards. Understanding which courses qualify for promotion points can help soldiers make informed decisions that align with their career goals. ### Why Army Correspondence Courses Matter for Promotion Promotion points are awarded based on several factors including military education, civilian education, awards, and military experience. Among these, military education—especially correspondence courses—is a valuable and accessible way to earn points. These courses demonstrate a soldier's commitment to learning and mastery of Army-related subjects. Plus, completing them doesn't require leaving your unit or interrupting your daily duties. The Army uses the Promotion Points Worksheet (DA Form 3355) to calculate points, and many correspondence courses contribute directly to the military education category. This means the more relevant courses you complete, the higher your score, improving your chances for promotion. ### Understanding the Types of Army Correspondence Courses Army correspondence courses fall under several categories, each offering different advantages. Here's a quick overview: - Non-Resident Training Courses (NRTC): These are courses provided through the Army Institute for Professional Development (AIPD) and often tied to specific Military Occupational Specialties (MOS). - Army Correspondence Course Program (ACCP): Offers a wide range of courses aimed at enhancing leadership, technical skills, and professional development. - eLearning Courses: Online courses that may also count towards professional military education (PME). - Civilian Education System (CES) and Army University courses: These can sometimes translate into promotion points when tied to military education. ### List of Army Correspondence Courses Worth Promotion Points When considering which correspondence courses to pursue, it's important to focus on those recognized by the Army for promotion boards. List of Army Correspondence Courses Worth Promotion Points: A Detailed Review list of army correspondence courses worth promotion points is a crucial consideration for many service members aiming to advance their military careers efficiently. With promotion boards placing significant weight on continuing education and professional development, understanding which Army correspondence courses contribute to promotion points can strategically enhance a soldier's profile. This article explores the most valuable correspondence courses available, their impact on promotion potential, and how soldiers can best leverage these opportunities.

Understanding the Role of Correspondence Courses in Army Promotions

In the U.S. Army, promotion points are awarded based on a soldier's military education, civilian education, awards, and performance. Correspondence courses fall under military education and are integral in accumulating promotion points, especially for enlisted personnel seeking advancement through structured professional development routes. These courses are designed to be completed remotely, providing flexibility to soldiers regardless of their duty station. The Army's promotion point system prioritizes continuous learning, and correspondence courses are a practical avenue to fulfill this requirement. They not only enhance a soldier's knowledge and skills but also demonstrate a commitment to self-improvement, a trait highly valued during promotion board evaluations.

Types of Army Correspondence Courses Worth Promotion Points

The Army offers a variety of correspondence courses that qualify for promotion points, primarily through the Army Correspondence Course Program (ACCP) managed by the Army Publishing Directorate. These courses cover a wide range of military occupational specialties (MOS), leadership, technical skills, and general military knowledge. Among the courses worth promotion points are:

1. Basic Leader Course (BLC) Correspondence: Serving as the foundational leadership training for junior enlisted soldiers, completing BLC via correspondence can significantly boost promotion points, especially for specialists and corporals aiming for sergeant.
2. Advanced Leader Course (ALC) Correspondence: Targeting sergeants preparing for staff sergeant roles, this course deepens leadership and technical expertise and carries substantial promotion point value.
3. Skill Qualification and Technical Courses: Specific MOS-related courses that enhance technical proficiency, such as communications, logistics, or intelligence specialties, often provide additional points when completed.
4. Army Institute for Professional Development (AIPD) Courses: These include a wide range of professional development and specialty courses that are recognized for promotion points.

Completing these courses not only adds to a soldier's military education points but also contributes to their professional development, making them more competitive for promotions.

How Promotion Points Are Calculated for Correspondence Courses

Each correspondence course completed awards a specific number of promotion points based on its length, complexity, and relevance. Generally, the Army allows up to 60 promotion points for military education, with correspondence courses contributing a significant portion of these. Promotion points are calculated as follows:

1. Course Completion: Soldiers earn points for each ACCP course completed and passed.
2. Course Length and Difficulty: Longer, more challenging courses typically offer more points.
3. Relevance to MOS and Rank: Courses closely aligned with a soldier's MOS and desired rank progression can yield higher points.

For example, completing the Basic Leader Course via correspondence might award up to 10 points, while more advanced courses like the Advanced Leader Course could provide 15 or more points. Soldiers can accumulate points by completing multiple courses, but there is a cap to prevent inflation of points solely through correspondence education.

Comparing Correspondence Courses to Other Education Options

While correspondence courses are valuable, soldiers also have access to other educational avenues like civilian college credits, Noncommissioned Officer Education System (NCOES) resident courses, and military schooling. Compared to resident courses, correspondence courses offer flexibility but typically award fewer points individually. Civilian education, especially when aligned with military occupational specialties, can sometimes yield comparable or more promotion points, but it requires more time and financial investment. Conversely, correspondence courses strike a balance by offering accessible, targeted training with promotion benefits.

Notable Army Correspondence Courses with High Promotion

Value

Several Army correspondence courses stand out for their recognized contribution to promotion points:

1. Basic Noncommissioned Officer Course (BNCOC) - Correspondence: Key for corporals and specialists, this course is foundational for leadership skills and promotion readiness.
2. Advanced Noncommissioned Officer Course (ANCOC) - Correspondence: Designed for staff sergeants, this course enhances advanced leadership and technical skills.
3. Army Leadership Development Program (ALDP): Focuses on leadership competencies and often supplements formal NCO education.
4. Military Occupational Specialty (MOS) Qualification Courses: These courses improve job-specific skills and contribute directly to military education points.
5. Army War College Distance Education Program: Primarily for officers but also available for senior enlisted soldiers, this program offers extensive professional military education.

Completion of these courses signals to promotion boards a soldier's dedication to both leadership and technical excellence.

Challenges and Considerations in Utilizing Correspondence Courses

Despite their benefits, correspondence courses present certain challenges that soldiers should consider:

1. Self-Discipline Required: Unlike classroom settings, correspondence courses demand high self-motivation and time management skills.
2. Limited Interaction: The absence of in-person instruction may affect comprehension of complex topics.
3. Verification and Documentation: Soldiers must ensure completed courses are properly documented in their official military records to receive promotion points.
4. Course Availability and Updates: Some courses may be periodically updated or phased out, requiring soldiers to stay informed about current offerings.

Balancing these factors is essential for maximizing the benefits of correspondence courses in career progression.

Maximizing Promotion Points Through Strategic Course Selection

For soldiers aiming to optimize their promotion prospects, a strategic approach to correspondence courses is advisable. This includes:

1. Prioritizing Leadership Courses: Courses like BLC and ALC should be completed early to secure essential promotion points.
2. Aligning Courses with MOS: Selecting technical courses relevant to one's MOS increases both promotion points and operational effectiveness.
3. Tracking Course Completion: Maintaining accurate records and ensuring courses are reflected in the Army Training Requirements and Resources System (ATRRS) or Army Training Management System (ATMS).
4. Balancing Civilian and Military Education: Combining correspondence courses with civilian education can maximize total promotion points.

By thoughtfully selecting and completing correspondence courses, soldiers can demonstrate initiative and readiness for higher responsibility. The landscape of army correspondence courses worth promotion points continues to evolve as the Army adapts to new training technologies and career development philosophies. For service members committed to advancement, staying informed about available courses and their promotion value remains a critical aspect of
